

Carrie Fountain
Prayer (The Ledge)

You think it's in the skull, behind the eyes, a room you make and then walk into.

You think it's the feeling of desperate thirst that sometimes arises

after you've begun to drink deeply, when it's only ever been the feeling you got when finally, after many weeks of staring at the impeccable outline the dove's body left when it crashed into your office window, open-winged, and died, you finally hung your ass onto the ledge and wiped it away with a damp Kleenex: the completion of a perfect and miserable task.

Most often there is nothing — really nothing — and the whole thing feels like an idea you gave yourself, like hypochondria, or even more distant, the memory of hypochondria, and even that idea is a place you can't be right now, because right now you are in the car, waiting out the endless light at the corner of MLK and Congress when the baby suddenly says, Song Mommy song now.

Thank you for reading! Find more at www.theharlequin.org.